The highest waterfalls are 82 meters high, even higher than the Niagara Falls in the USA. The first European to discover the Iguazu waterfalls was Alvar Nunez Cabeza de Vaca, a Spanish conquistador, after whom one of the waterfalls was named. Between the individual waterfalls there are several islands, some of which can be reached during a visit. The Argentinean and Brazilian sides are each located in a national park. The National Park of Argentina has been a UNESCO World Heritage Site since 1984 and that of Brazil since 1986. Iguazu is a Guaran-derived word that can best be translated as "big water". The Guarani are among the indigenous people of this region of South America. Depending on the season, the flight Iguazu leads different amounts of water.
